

What is Your Minimalist Destination? « Far Beyond The Stars

Written by Everett Bogue | Follow me on Twitter

Being minimalist is having the flexibility to do what you want, when you wish to do it.

Think about it, if you wanted to, could you do these things:

- Can you fly to Peru next Friday?
- Can you start your own company in a month?
- Can you relocate to Vancouver next week?
- If you lost your job, would it be devastating?

I don't believe you should just be minimalist for the sake of being minimalist. The philosophy has to have another reason, and it's important to write that down.

Think of something impossible, an objective that you've always wanted to achieve, but that everyone told you was impractical. Make that your goal for next year.

Write that goal down.

When I quit my job and flew to Portland Oregon in August, it was easy, because I could carry all of my stuff. I lived a sustainable life, so surviving on $3,000 for three months wasn't a problem while I worked my freelance contacts online.

Many people are trapped in their own lives by their stuff. But the reality is, we don't need any of it anymore.

Despite what they might tell you on television news, we live in an age of abundance.

You can have everything you ever wanted, it's down at the corner store. It's important to recognize that you can have everything that you want, but if you limit yourself to the essentials you will open a world of possibilities for yourself. You can live anywhere, you can work in anywhere.

It doesn't matter who you are, the possibilities are open if you get rid of the physical, mental, and emotional stuff.

You can be free. You can do the impossible.

—

Here's my 'impossible' goal for next year:

I want make Far Beyond The Stars my primary source of income. A handful of people have told me this is impossible, but I don't believe that is true now. Leo Babauta has done this, Chris Guillebeau has done this. Many others make $60,000-$100,000 a year off their blogs.

I'm aiming for a more modest $30,000. That's a little more than I need to survive, with those extra dollars I'll buy my girlfriend a birthday present.

I'm going to keep writing posts that help people. I want to continue to teach people how to simplify their lives and be happier.

How can you help me do this? Share my stories with a few friends. If you enjoy an article, there is a 'share' option at the bottom of the post. Post my story to Twitter, Facebook, or email it to a couple of folks. This is so easy, it takes 10 seconds, and it's the only way that my articles reach new people.

Only share my post if you enjoyed it, only do this if you think they will enjoy reading it too.

It also helps if you sign up to receive free updates via RSS or email.

I created a support page, which has a donate button on it. If you ever feel like my words are bringing value to your life, if they help in any way, consider giving a small amount.

If only a handful of people give a small amount this year, my goal is no longer an impossibility.

—

What impossible goals will you set for yourself next year? How will you achieve them?

Excerpted from What is Your Minimalist Destination? « Far Beyond The Stars | Augmented Humanity,

Second Selves, and Cybernetic Yoga

<http://www.farbeyondthestars.com/how-to-be-mindful-of-flexibility/>

READABILITY — An Arc90 Laboratory Experiment <http://lab.arc90.com/experiments/readability>