

The Art of Being Minimalist (explaining the end) « Far Beyond The Stars

Written by Everett Bogue | Twitter made us minimalists.

Information is flowing faster.

An idea that we come up today will be adopted by the collective tomorrow.

Remember two months ago when everyone thought I'd lost my mind when I started to talk about cyborgs/augmented humanity? Then suddenly Eric Schmidt and Amber Case start talking about the same thing, and we're living in a world-wide cyborg-coming-out party.

I like to call this idea-triangulation. The same thing happened when people were terrified about the idea of becoming a minimalist a year ago. As Derek Sivers mentioned: "The first follower transforms a lone nut into a leader."

This is just one example of how much faster info travels than it did one year ago.

When I wrote The Art of Being Minimalist, the world needed instructions. It needed someone to tell the world, point blank: here's what happens when you throw out all of your stuff.

And this, admittedly prescriptive knowledge worked, for a time.

However, then one day I realized that I wasn't a minimalist at all. I was an augmented human, I had been from the start.

Then, I began to see the pattern in augmented humanity everywhere: minimalism was simply a side-effect of developing skill in mental cybernetics.

—

We are responsible for the ideas that we put out onto the Internet.

Once the ideas go out, they can't come back.

Information propagates infinitely faster than we can hit the delete key.

That being said, we can (and should) take responsibility for distribution to a point. If an idea is no longer valid, we can't continue to sell it.

When I look at The Art of Being Minimalist, I see a movement that had it's time.

Minimalism is an element of augmented reality. There will always be space to teach that knowledge, and many will continue to do so.

As humans begin to see the way that augmented humanity is living, the incentive will be to transition into this new life. The ideas behind minimalism will allow that, but it needs an upgrade first.

I leave that up to you.

As for me, I'm stepping away from minimalism as a movement.

I live out of a bag. I live anywhere. My second self takes care of me. The mental tools of a newly augmented world make this possible. To follow this journey, follow me on Twitter —one of the most powerful mental cybernetic tools to cultivate.

The choice of minimalism was to embrace our cultural evolution, the choice came, the choice went.

Minimalism, the movement, can now be reduced to a simple equation:

"Rent a dumpster, throw your crap in it, join the future."

On Febraury 10th at 11:59pm EST, I'm taking The Art of Being Minimalist off the market.

The end of an era happened...

—

There will be more to come in the next few days, keep your eyes on this space via Twitter.

"Blank Page...?"

Excerpted from The Art of Being Minimalist (explaining the end) « Far Beyond The Stars | Augmented Humanity, Second Selves, and Cybernetic Yoga
<http://www.farbeyondthestars.com/art-of-being-minimalist-end/>

READABILITY — An Arc90 Laboratory Experiment <http://lab.arc90.com/experiments/readability>